PROGRAMME

Cover Design
Laxman Aelay

Born in 1964 at Kadirenigudem village of Telangana, Aelay Laxman is highly reputed artist for his contemporary depictions of the rural Telangana imagery. Like many other successful artists, he too started his artistic journey as a signboard artist and illustrator before coming to the mainstream art. Now, a research scholar at the English and Foreign Languages University, Laxman completed his Masters in Painting from Jawaharlal Nehru Architecture and Fine Arts University, Hyderabad and worked as an Art Director for films. He is credited with numerous important shows and was part of several art camps held in India and abroad.

Laxman's vibrant quasi-realistic paintings and arduously drawn imagery evoke a sense of apprehension and nostalgia. His men and women in typical Telangana attire proclaim their cultural identity. His first solo show in 90' was titled, 'Images of Kadirenigudem', on the name of his native village. From then on, the representation of Telangana life in all its vitality and vigor become his personal visual idiom even in his recent one man show, 'Fellow Travellers' in 2014. The paintings at his very recent solo show in Gallery, Mumbai, titled 'Fellow Travellers' demonstrate highly skillful renditions of portraits layered with imagery taken from folk arts of Nakashi, Kalamkari, Paithan etc. These larger than life size hyper realistic images of street performers, itinerant bards and tantalizing common people are built and rebuilt over multiple layers of motifs that burst from his subconscious memory revealing predicaments of oppressed communities.

Chai, Culture and Conversation

It's July and the monsoons have broken over the centuries-old Deccani city of Hyderabad. It's a special time here, in many ways, reflecting the cultural mélange that makes the city what it is. It is the month of Ramzan and our city's icon, the Charminar, is brilliantly lit up, inviting the devout and the curious to explore the old city's bazaars. The lights of the Infotech city beckon with a different message, repositioning themselves in a capital that is rediscovering its place in India. In the chai shops that dot the city, conversations revolve around politics (always), the rain (sometimes) and the future (accompanied by a hopeful "inshallah"). The tone seems perfect for discussion and debates, both old and new.

Telangana, India's 29th and youngest province, is an apt location in which to situate our discussions around the conference theme, "Region as Frame: Politics, Presence, Practice." Statehood followed a protracted struggle on several fronts, and its achievement is not without continued contestation. Identities, rights and responsibilities become foregrounded against a politics that is simultaneously hyperlocal and global, fuelled as it is by multiple migrations of people, goods, and ideas across state and national borders.

For the members of the Local Organizing Committee, the conference will be the culmination of more than a year's effort. Beginning with the bid and its confirmation at the 2013 Dublin meeting, we have travelled the intervening months with a mix of anxiety and excitement, arguing over the programme and fretting over the arrangements, wanting to put together something that would help participants catch up with old conversations and begin new ones. From worries about visas to micromanaging arrival and departure schedules, we have tried to make your journey here as smooth as possible.

The programme is a packed one, perhaps no different from every other IAMCR meeting, and sometimes this means difficult choices for participants. But it's a problem of plenty. And when the mind needs a different kind of stimulus, there is also a film festival and many interesting special panels to choose from. We also hope you will take some time to get to know Hyderabad—its old and new avatars.

The Local Organizing Committee is delighted to welcome you all to the conference and hope that you will have an enriching experience in our city.

The different interwoven strands represent the movement of people across distance and time to draw and redraw the shifting boundaries of region. Within these imagined spaces people commune, connect and sometimes move away and beyond to create new formations, new networks, that are in some ways the same, yet in others, diverse and unforeseen.

Region as Frame: Politics, Presence, Practice

The breaking down of some of the world's walls has created an uncertainty about the geographies and substantive nature of the regions they had once defined. This includes physical boundaries such as the Berlin wall, ideological ones such as those in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, economic ones such as those that had once separated India and other socialist economies from the capitalist West, and cultural ones such as those that had hidden the lives of people in the Middle Eastern and Soviet bloc.

Mobility, migration and disembodied interactions by cyberspace further complicate the notion of region as a conceptual and experiential category. New regional hierarchies, such as the economic power of emerging economies (BRICS) are taking shape, serving to decentre traditional loci of power, while different forms of identity politics are creating fissures in the modern nation state. Corporations have acquired the power to dictate politics through their ownership of forms and channels of expression, and this has created a new urgency to re-think old political economy arguments around media control and dispersal in a regional rather than global framework.

The conference theme seeks to explore the dynamics of media systems, communication patterns and organizational relationships within this new "framing" of region as a physical and conceptual category. The theme thus lends itself to panels and papers dealing with a wide range of specific sub-themes and topics. These may include:

- What are the politics that drive media discourse, organization and economics?
- What kind of presence is at all possible in this redefined regional space, and how does region become a real and imagined construct across new media presences?
- What sorts of practices then become key to media and communication spaces enclosed in or defined by this new frame?

Message from the Co-Chairs, IAMCR 2014

Welcome to Hyderabad!

The University of Hyderabad and the English & Foreign Languages University are delighted to host this year's conference of the International Association for Media and Communication Research. Both institutions have a tradition of combining a global outlook with a regional—and local—focus, structuring their programmes and activities in a manner that gives students and researchers a space to draw from a range of perspectives while encouraging them to apply their learning in locally appropriate ways. This is the approach that underlies scholarship and practice across the disciplines that are represented in our institutions. We believe that the learning to be derived from media and communication studies can play a role in fostering such critical thinking and relective practice in the wider academy as well as in the public sphere.

Given this orientation, we are particularly pleased to be involved in organizing this conference, which attracts a diverse group of scholars, activists and practitioners from around the globe. The theme of this year's conference is not only relevant but timely, considering the recent movements and shifts that have taken place in our own region.

Hyderabad represents a unique confluence of cultures and a blend of the modern and the traditional. It offers many studies in contrast, but at its heart is a cosmopolitanism that has made it attractive to the many groups that now call it home. We hope you will take time to discover something of the city. If you have the time, we'd be happy to welcome you to our campuses as well.

Best wishes for a productive and stimulating conference!

Message from the President IAMCR

IAMCR has gathered in Hyderabad this year to share our research, to work together, and to renew old friendships and make new ones.

“Region as Frame: Politics, Presence, and Practice” - the conference theme chosen by the Local Organizing Committee - is timely and important in the context of India, as well as the rest of the world. The theme is represented by a compelling image that features multicolored strands interwoven to become a strong and beautiful braid. As described by the committee: “The different interwoven strands represent the movement of people across distance and time to draw and redraw the shifting boundaries of region. Within these imagined spaces people commune, connect and sometimes move away and beyond to create new formations, new networks, that are in some ways the same, yet in others, diverse and unforeseen.” Undoubtedly, this theme will be woven through the plenaries, special sessions, and Section and Working Group panels, as well as the social events and informal gatherings.

In addition, several special sessions have been planned to discuss IAMCR’s participation in UNESCO’s Global Alliance for Media and Gender (GAMAG) and Global Alliance for Partnerships on Media and Information Literacy (GAPMIL), as well as recent UNESCO studies of the Internet, and Freedom of Expression and Media Development. (A summary of these sessions can be found in the back pages of this program.) We will also honor Stuart Hall in a special plenary, which will include the announcement of a new IAMCR award.

We were pleased this year to be able to support 25 early-stage members from 16 different countries through travel grants, as well as 15 additional fellowships awarded by the Local Organizing Committee to early career scholars from India in honor of Professor K. E. Eapen (The recipients are listed on the Awards page).

As you participate in the conference activities, you may want to reflect on the conference theme as it relates to the nature of IAMCR itself. “International” is not just a word in the name of the association. IAMCR strives to be a truly international organization. As a reminder: We have members in over 95 countries. We maintain a formal relationship with the United Nations system as a non-governmental organization and have Special Consultative Status with UNESCO. In addition, we serve as an umbrella association for national and regional organizations in the field, encouraging groups to organize activities at our conferences. Over the years, we have met in 30 different countries and have traveled to every continent. We have an obligation to meet in different regions of the world to facilitate global participation, to share our work with a wide range of researchers, and “to commune and connect.”

Finally, we would like to express gratitude to our local hosts from the University of Hyderabad and the English & Foreign Languages University, as well as the many sponsors and individuals who helped make these meetings and events possible.

Best wishes for a productive and enjoyable conference!

Prof. K E Eapen Fellowships

Professor Eapen was the first convener of the University Grants Commission (UGC) panel on mass communication, and the first UGC National Lecturer and Emeritus Fellow, Journalism/Communication. He served as consultant, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting; Vice-President, Commonwealth Association for Education in Journalism and Communication; and Vice-President, International Association for Media

Professor Eapen was a pioneer in identifying the significance of the Satellite Instructional Television Experiment (SITE) and initiated a SITE evaluation study in the Karnataka cluster in 1975-76 when the nation experimented with satellite technology in taking developmental messages to the underdeveloped areas. His book, Critical Issues in Communication: Looking Inward for Answers has been inspiring for many communication studies scholars. Prof. Eapen passed away in 2010.

Plenary Sessions

Opening Plenary

The Networked Metropolis: Global Connectivity, Regional Disconnection

Tuesday July 15 2014, 17.30 – 19.00. Hall 3

Professor of Sociology and Professor of City and Regional Planning at the University of California, Manuel Castells is especially associated with research on the information society, communication and globalization. His talk will explore the dynamics between the global communication networks that connect the world through metropolitan nodes, and the process of cultural and social inequality within each region, following the logic of networks that both connect and disconnect.

Mr. Jawahar Sircar, Chief Executive Officer of Prasar Bharti, India's national public service broadcaster, with the rank of Secretary to the Government of India, will speak on how broadcasting professionals and academicians can work together for mutual benefit.

Plenary 1

Tribute to Stuart Hall

Wednesday, July 16, 2014, 11.00 – 12.30. Hall 3

Communication and cultural studies scholars the world over learned with deep regret of the passing on February 20, 2014, of Professor Stuart Hall, one of the preeminent and iconic leaders of social and political discourse in our field. IAMCR will pay tribute to his memory by dedicating one of its plenary sessions in his honour at IAMCR 2014 Hyderabad, India.

Speakers

Hopeton Dunn is Professor of Communications Policy and Digital Media at the University of the West Indies in Jamaica, where he holds an endowed Chair in Telecommunications Policy and Management.

Prof. Susie Tharu is a member of the Subaltern Studies Collective and founder member of Anveshi, Research Centre for Women's Studies, Hyderabad, she was instrumental in introducing Cultural Studies at EFLU and setting up the department.

Colin Sparks is Professor of Media Studies at Hong Kong Baptist University in Hong Kong. A founder editor of the journal Media, Culture & Society, he has written extensively on international communication, development and journalism.

Sandra Ristovska is a documentary filmmaker and a PhD student in communication at the Annenberg School for Communication, University of Pennsylvania. Her research explores the role of online video in public discourse and policy deliberations with a particular focus on human rights video advocacy.

Garry Whannel is Professor of Media Cultures and Director of Research Institute for Media Art and Design (RIMAP) at the University of Bedfordshire. He has been researching popular culture, media and sport for over 30 years.

Plenary 2

Innovations in C4D in collaboration with UNICEF

Thursday July 17 2014, 11.00 – 12.30, Hall 3

Although progress has been made over the years, a recurrent observation in the communication for development (C4D) field has been the limited cross-fertilization between theory and practice. Many in the academic world of C4D would argue that the pace of theoretical analysis and growth often exceeds the ability of practitioners to reflect it in their applied work. By contrast, C4D practitioners are increasingly confronted with greater demands for articulating a clear theory of change (i.e., what interventions lead to what results), and robust evidence of how C4D contributes to programmatic outcomes.

This panel examines trends, challenges and opportunities to bridge the gap between theory and practice in communication for development, including perspectives from a mix of representatives from the academic world and from the world of practitioners (including UN agencies and NGOs). Panel presentations will map out current trends in the C4D field, including a focus on social norms, social networks, ICTs; discuss case studies that illustrate how the practice of C4D has evolved and what differences it makes in and across development sectors (e.g. Health, HIV, Water and Sanitation); and share lessons learned on collaborative efforts between academics and practitioners to broaden the richness of C4D as a field of study and practice. Panelists will put forward key questions and recommendations for further discussion with the audience and beyond.

Governing Digital Spaces: Issues of Access, Privacy and Freedom

Friday July 18 2014, 11.00 – 12.30. Hall 3

Internet governance affects a wide range of social and political issues. It affects who gets to participate in the online economy. It affects intellectual property and determines who gets access to the key technical resources, such as domain names and IP addresses, that make Internet service possible. And access to this technology is restricted not only by price but also by control, not only in terms of technology, but also by policy. As a target of government surveillance, it affects privacy and civil liberties. It affects freedom of expression, forcing the world's diverse policies to be harmonized. Internet governance provokes debates over the global balance of power, surveillance and privacy among citizens and organizations. This panel comprises speakers from different countries, each representing a different standpoint on the issue.

The Continued Resilience of Print Media in Asia

In collaboration with the Centre for Media Studies, New Delhi

Saturday July 19 2014, 14.00 – 15.30. Hall 5

The Asian newspaper industry is remarkable in having continued to grow against the new media-use patterns of the digital era. In countries such as India, Japan, Indonesia and China, newspaper readership continues to broaden, with the number and range of publications, particularly in non-English spaces, growing or at the very least, stabilizing. The panel, which will involve representatives from both the industry and academia, discusses the factors behind this resilience and the dynamics of print media in the region.

Speakers

Dr. N. Bhaskara Rao is the founder and Chairman of the Centre for Media Studies (CMS), New Delhi. His work focused on electronic media and telecommunications which helped the respective ministries in formulating perspectives and strategies. He contributed in expanding television and India going for color TV.

Special Sessions

Special Session 1

Media Education: The Changes and Challenges

Wednesday July 16 2014, 14.00 – 15.30. Hall 5

In an increasingly complex media environment, educating young professionals and preparing young scholars present several challenges. The demand for cross-functionality, the pressures of corporatization, the politics of ownership and the emergence of community voices and channels has led to a rethinking and retooling within the academy. The panel will reflect the challenges that continue to face media educators.

Speakers

Braj Kishore Kuthiala, (Chair), B. P. Sanjay, Basayouni Hamada, Ibrahim Saleh, Guy Berger

Special Session 2

Regional Cinemas in India: Practices, Politics, Stardom

Wednesday July 16 2014, 16.00 – 17.30. Hall 5

Indian cinema, constituted of the cinemas produced in regional languages like Tamil, Telugu, Kannada, Marathi etc., has always enabled a heterogenous space towards asserting the nation-state as the site of representations and contestations. The various regional film industries have historically traversed the arenas of social mobilization, religious adulation and political processes and have asserted their significance apart from the nationally popular Hindi cinema. In the last two decades there has been a resurgence of the regional film industries in India. This session has been planned to facilitate a dialogue and discussion occasioned by some of most important publications centered on regional cinemas in India.

Special Session 3 and 4

Mediating Marginalities: Issues of Race, Caste, Ethnicity and Gender

Thursday July 17 2014, 14.00 – 15.30; 16.00 – 17.30. Hall 5

The contemporary world has to contend with multiple forms of marginalities. Social Sciences and Humanities have engaged with familiar marginalities relating to race, gender, ethnicity, caste and sexual orientations. Recent scholarship also acknowledges the proliferation of ever newer forms of marginalities which correspond to global economy, international relations, stability and instability of national regimes and cultures. Some of these marginalities relate to religious and linguistic minorities, borderland and diasporic communities, populations displaced due to civil and international wars and so on.

This two-session symposium explores global perspectives in marginalities of race, caste, class, ethnicity and gender, simultaneously as philosophical, political and anthropological categories.

Regional Framing and ICA

Friday July 18 2014, 14.00 – 15.30. MR 1.06

How academic associations accommodate place is a central aspect of their self-identity. This panel considers the ways in which “the region” has been made and kept relevant in scholarship associated with the International Communication Association, to both positive and negative effect. It brings together present and former officers of the association, journal editors and longstanding members to address how “the region” has been variously used as a frame in ICA-related contexts. Under discussion will be the shape of comparative media studies, the global spread of feminist studies, the internationalization of ICA-related journals, the uneven inclusion of countries of the Global South in research agendas, and the role played by regionalism in the crisis facing contemporary journalism.

Barbie Zelizer, Colin Sparks, Carolyn Byerly, Peter Voderer, Radhika Parameswaran

Special Session 6

Continuing Challenges in Health Communication

Organised in collaboration with the Mudra Institute of Communications, Ahmedabad

Friday July 18 2014, 14.00 – 15.30. Hall 5

In the context of the Millennium Development Goals, the focus in health communication has shifted to looking at and addressing the “causes of the causes” of disease and ill health. This has necessitated a move beyond the usual campaign targets of communicable diseases, immunization, and maternal and child health, to encompass more deep rooted social, cultural, political and behavioural issues that need to be tackled if health for all is to become a reality. Chronic disease and lifestyle diseases are a major thrust in this new approach to health communication. This panel will focus on some of the challenges and opportunities facing health communication in these areas.

Special Session 7

Soft Power and the Media Industry in the BRICS

Friday July 18 2014, 16.00 – 17.30. Hall 5.

This panel will examine the emerging Soft Power discourses within the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa) nations, whose annual summits are being increasingly noticed outside the five countries, which together account for 20 per cent of the world’s GDP. Although it has been in operation as a formal group since 2006 and holding annual summits since 2009, the study of BRICS’ Soft Power in a comparative and transnational perspective has escaped academic and policy scrutiny.

Speakers

Special Session 8

ALAIC/ECREA

Friday July 18 2014, 16.00 – 17.30. MR 2.05

Growing interconnections between countries and regions within an increasing globalised planet are inviting all scholars to critically think about the historical evolution, the current status quo and the future of Communication Research worldwide. This necessary approach must be completed from a wide perspective in terms of its geopolitical scope, being always open to the dialogue between local, national, regional and global insights and situations.

This panel tries to take a new step in this process, following some other previous relevant (Montevideo 2012) and ECREA (Istanbul 2012) conferences or the first meeting of Communication Research Associations held in Bilbao last January.

Communication Theories in a Multicultural World

Wednesday, July 16 2014, 12.30 – 14.00. Exhibition Space, Hall 4

Edited by Clifford Christians and Kaarle Nordenstreng

This volume is an up-to-date account of communication theories from around the world.

Authored by a group of eminent scholars, each chapter is a history and state-of-the-art description of the major issues in international communication theory. While the book draws on an understanding of communication theory as a product of its socio-political and cultural context, and the challenges posed by that context, it also highlights each author's lifetime effort to critique the existing trends in communication theory and bring out the very best in each

The IAMCR has offered, with the support of the Media Program of the Open Society Foundations (OSF), several grants for research conducted by emerging scholars to contribute new and critical knowledge in several topic areas within the broader terrain of media and communications policy where new trends are emerging and where research gaps exist. Grants have been assigned at the end of 2013 and research has been conducted in early 2014. This session offers the recipients of those grants the possibility to publicly present their work, discuss a range of emerging issues in global communication policy, and identify ways in which their work can be connected to existing policy-related projects, including the IAMCR Mapping Global Media Policy.

The Working Group on Global Media Policy has decided to focus its activities over the years 2014 and 2015 on major upcoming international events and high level summits that will take stock, assess, celebrate longer term processes relevant to the evolution and transformations of global media policy: the World Summit on the Information Society +10, the Internet Governance Forum, the Beijing Conference on Women +20 and the Millennium Development Goals. The Business meeting will therefore focus on such activities, including preparation for the IAMCR 2015 Conference and cooperation with the IAMCR Policy TF.

makers and decision-making. The question ‘does scientific knowledge make a difference in knowledge societies?’ invites a reflective attitude towards how knowledge is ‘conceived and used’ in ideating and implementing mechanisms to steer and regulate today’s digital environments. The panel also welcomes experience-based storytelling of the opportunities and risks of channeling scientific knowledge through policy making.

Media in India: Fact File

Indian media, one of the prominent stakeholders in the country's rich democratic heritage has emerged over the years as a highly formidable, diverse and vibrant national institution that formulates the necessary checks and balances for good governance. The growth and penetration of Indian media has been phenomenal with the figures escalating to a staggering INR 918 billion in 2013. There are about 161 million TV households, 94,067 newspapers (12,511 dailies), 214 million internet users out of which 130 million are mobile internet users (KPMG report , 2014).

The Print Media:

Braving the odds like global slowdown, the immense competition from television and digital mediums; the print media in India continues its growth trajectory. India has one of the most aggressive readership trends with whopping 52 million bi-annual subscriptions of daily newspapers (ABC, 2014). In comparison to the elite English newspaper, the regional and vernacular press captures about 60% of the market share. The broadsheet newspapers and magazines have experimented with design and content to keep pace with the changing reading preferences of new age audiences. Most print endeavours are digitally savvy and have an online presence in the form of websites and mobile apps.

The Broadcast Media:

The 1990s witnessed a meteoric rise in the broadcast media. The entry of a large number of private satellite TV channels and FM radio stations redefined the mediascape of the country. According to latest reports from the Ministry of Information & Broadcasting India there are more than 800 private satellite channels and around 400 FM stations.

Over the last decade, the Indian Broadcast industry has grown in scale – with new channel launches and enhanced digital distribution. With the increase in the number of channels (GEC and niche genre specific channels alike), the scale of business operations has grown manifold. The television industry in India is worth INR417 billion and registers an annual growth rate of 16 percent. Digitisation of transmission and distribution has increased the subscription revenue for broadcasters, who are able deliver quality content to audiences.

The New Media:

India has become the world’s third largest user base which follows the USA and China. The convenience, popularity and affordability of hand held devices like smart phones and tablets has increased internet exposure significantly. It is estimated that the mobile internet user base will grow up to 350 million by the end of 2018. India is a leading user of social media and also ranks third in terms of number of mobile app downloads (Google Play 2013).

Is Communication Research in India Coming of Age?

Prof. Usha Vyasulu Reddy, PhD

Educationist and ICTD Consultant. Hyderabad 500 082

I. Introduction

The growth of communication as a discipline of study in India and my career has moved almost concurrently. When I began my career in 1975, there were just a handful of teaching and research departments, at Punjab, Osmania, Bangalore, Madras, Varanasi and a few other locations. Today, there are a plethora of teaching departments at public and private universities, and a huge number of trade schools teaching the craft. There is a sea change in the academic research and teaching community.

For the last thirty five years, I have straddled two different worlds, a world of teaching and research in communication, and the world of applications of communication for development. There are learnings from each of these worlds that I would like to share with you here, and to draw your attention to the gaps that communication researchers need to address, if indeed we are to make a 'mainstream' contribution to development and nation building.

Most social sciences, including communication have two dimensions, the academic and the applied. While the academic provides dimension and deeper theoretical insights and analyses, the applied perspective needs these insights to apply them to real world problems and issues in the use of communication technologies. One can argue endlessly about where our research emphasis should be, but I believe there is a synergy—action on the ground guides the formation of constructs and theories and policies—in turn, these are the guiding principles on which we base our work on the ground.

If research has no implication for theory, if it lacks even a minimum of scientific method and explanatory power, it should not be undertaken. At the same time, if research in the context of national social and economic development cannot provide a clear, direct, and unambiguous line between results and decision alternatives, it lacks pragmatic validity and similarly should not be undertaken. In a developing country, the ultimate test of the value of research is a pragmatic one, its usefulness in practice. By this test, much of the research done in the name of development has been a waste. The field of communication and communication research is no exception and I am often left to wonder about the value of many a publication I read in the field.

Wang (2011) has made a critical assessment of the centrality of the communication when faced with the digital revolution. She argues that trying to study communication today is like shooting at a fast moving target in terms of the digital revolution. What seems to have happened in the last two decades is that the sudden and exponential growth of what are today's information and communication technologies, (essentially computer and internet based systems) has so eclipsed the core of communication research in Asia that the agendas and priorities of research have shifted away. This is reflected by Bryant and Yang as an outcome of a content analysis that they have conducted into the nature of communication research in Asia. In the same vein, Lent (1989) has argued that "The speed with which much of the new technology has been introduced and expanded in Asia has brought undesired consequences, e.g., much dialogue previously focused on development journalism, ethics, or freedom of expression has shifted to information hardware." This is also reflected in the continued requests I have received from Asia Pacific institutions that I focus less on communication and development and more on 'ICTs and Development' in the training materials I have prepared over the last five years.

What also seems to have taken place is that the academic research has remained very much the exclusive territory of communication researchers. Wang (2011) further argues that while technologies are changing rapidly, communication studies as research and as a discipline faces some 'inertia' in the way we approach the field. While the technologies have undergone a sea change, the approaches to investigate these studies have remained very much the same.

However, there is a lot of activity in the second world I have straddled—i.e. field application of communication to address development programmes and projects. The application of communication media and the study of such applications has become a field which is a free for all, with everyone, from engineers and doctors, to IT vendors and politicians, being involved, with everyone having a solution—an “end to end solution”. Usually, as my experience shows, this translates to an ‘end to end problem. This engagement of everyone with communication had led to the blurring of the lines between the hardware, software, and social contexts and conditions in which the technologies are placed. It has led to a dilution of the rigour which is the hallmark of good research. As a result, we have a large number of experiments and pilots (success stories, large and small) but limited clear evidence of success in bringing about the behavioural change that is the intention of the application of the technologies in the first place. In fact, the globally reported rate of success is about 20 per cent of projects—which means that four out of five communication and development experiments fail!....

Therefore, there is a disconnect between the world of academic teaching and research, and the field of applications of communication.

So, where are we going wrong? Is it in our conceptual understanding of the paradigms (the past dominant one, the current participatory approaches; or is it in the selection and application of any one selected paradigm? Or is it in our lack of understanding of digital media—transformationally different from the previous media avatars? Or, is there some other dimension or issue that has been missed?

Over the past few weeks, I have been revisiting the dominant paradigms in communication and development discourse. In the course of this revisit, I undertook a new analysis of their passing... What is it that my analysis revealed?

II. The Issues

Emerging from the current realities in the application of communications for development are some important causes of the failures reported earlier. The underlying assumptions of the dominant paradigm, that Western models are the ideal, and perhaps, the only way to achieve social change; that economic development equates with social development; that one could come in from the outside and apply media models without adequate respect and recognition for local cultures and realities; and the final assumption that communication alone can bring about social change. This much analysis emerges from my academic teaching and research work.

What my work in the application and evaluation of communication media experiments and experiences in the country tells me is a different story. It is a story of compromise with the fundamental premises of existing theory. It is a story of compromises at every stage of the process, from planning and design to implementation and evaluation. There is technological determinism; there are decisions taken which impact on a project in terms of design failures, e.g. designing the inappropriate technology or media use in a project. There are numerous instances of being driven by the agendas of donor and funding agencies; of assumptions made about field conditions without adequate data or field experience. There are the administrative locations of communication projects either in a line ministry like agriculture or locating them in information and broadcasting; and finally, the creation of hybrid agencies to deliver a programme. The hybrid agency created as a solution often becomes the problem rather than the solution. And finally, lack of political will and support; bureaucratic styles of functioning and decision making which go against the grammar of the media; all these realities add up to a myriad set of causes that all spell DOOM for communication projects.

There are also new ‘dimensions’ to the current promotion and use of information and communication technologies. Earlier, when developing countries developed broadcasting policies and systems in their countries, these were done as a part of a broader development agenda and through trial and experience, many national broadcasters understood the nature and grammar of the medium. This is no longer so. A survey of literature will yield any number of large and small scale experimentation taking place in the use of new media we do not know what worked; what did not; or what can be scaled up; what should be scaled down or why?

We are also finding that most initiatives are supply rather than need driven. In other words, the approach to an initiative has come from a donor agency, a government, ICT agency or vendor, but rarely as a consequence of an expressed demand for the provision of ICT integrated development. And we find that the deployment is most often to ‘deliver services, whether e governance, e health, e agriculture, etc’ but not to result in directed social change.

Initiatives generally designed and implemented by conventional governments as part of a broad developmental agenda reflect the “conventionalism” of existing institutions; they combine hierarchical and bureaucratic systems of administration. Models of project management where projects or initiatives are implemented centrally fail to adequately take local needs into consideration. This results in a constant tussle between local requirements and the need to enable the development of local solutions.

While economies of scale make large projects and initiatives attractive, the solutions need to be location, problem, time, and people specific. The politics of monopoly and central control do not favour decentralization and provide the autonomy need to effectively implement locally.

Conversely, local solutions when up-scaled, even to meet regional needs, often fail. Sometimes, a project that worked in one part of the country will not succeed in another. Thus, when one looks for change at a micro level, it does not get adequately reflected on a national dimension—and similarly the transformation that are possible in small well organized local and problem specific situations are not possible when either the technology or the content is upscaled to meet the needs of a wider population.

As a result, we find that large communication projects become increasingly inflexible in terms of design, content, implementation; while small projects have not addressed the issues of “how to scale up” There is little research to guide us to in addressing these kinds of issues.

And finally, despite the growing emphasis on the theme of communication and development, there is a notable lack of methodologically sound information to base policy making in these areas. (Huyer and Mitter)

The question that comes to mind is simply this—are theory and practice going in parallel lines never to converge; or are there points of intersection when there is synergy and each can benefit from the other. I think there are areas of intersection and synergy—but it is for communication scholars and practitioners to come out and mainstream the field.

Three decades ago, India and Indonesia undertook large scale experimentation with the use of satellite technologies for development. Findings from the extensive research that preceded and followed these experiments were many and demonstrated what could be done if the right kinds of questions were asked and the appropriate data gathered. Use of satellite technology for different development applications never looked back after those initial experiments.

That experimentation was perhaps the only time that both scholars and practitioners of communication and development came together to test real models of communication in the field. At least, this has been my experience during the last thirty five years of teaching, research, and practice. And incidentally, some of the names of scholars we talk about and you read about such as Kiran Karnik, Binod Agrawal, Bella Mody and Srinivas Melkote were part of those heady days of experimentation in India. And the world watched as a bunch of young, inexperienced, but deeply committed and daring team put together and successfully implemented some of the largest experiments in communication for development.

IV. In Lieu of a Conclusion

Some of you are probably wondering why I have raised these issues and questions. Some of you are probably thinking that these are the musings of a person in the twilight of a long career. I wanted to draw attention to the current disconnect between theory and the practice of communication in India. This disconnect is a cause for serious concern, but it is not one that cannot be bridged. My belief is that if communications scholars actively pursue and address application oriented research and subsequently proactively engage in advocacy with policy and decision makers, it will be possible to execute campaigns such as the Pulse Polio in India. It is my belief that we cannot afford to lose the opportunity to ensure the inclusion of our inputs into policy making, project planning and implementation in developing countries and to do that, we have to bridge the current gap between the academic and the applied aspects of communication for development.

I titled this presentation “Is Communication Research in India Coming of Age?” My answer to this question is ‘not yet.’ We are in a period of intense churning and conflict in the field of communication, much like adolescence is for human growth. Gone are the days when we will, like children, blindly accept the theories and practices that come to us from outside our borders. At the same time, our field has not yet matured as it has elsewhere. In the West, it took nearly a half century to mature. We are now midway into that half century—where departments such as this are just completing 25 years and consolidating themselves as centres of excellence. And the pursuit of excellence is a journey, not a destination and it is a journey that we all have to take together.

We think we know the answers, but do we know the questions we seek answers to?

SERIES

CALL FOR PROPOSALS:

The International Association for Media and Communications Research (IAMCR) has been, for over 50 years, a focal point and unique platform for academic debate and discussion on a variety of topics and issues. This new series specifically links to the intellectual capital of the IAMCR and offers more systematic and comprehensive opportunities for the publication of key research and debates. The series will provide a space to rethink the categories of space and place, time and geography, through which communication studies has evolved, in order to provide a platform for knowledge exchange from different geocultural contexts.
